Harry Potter and the Portrait of what Looked Like a Large Pile of Ash
Chapter thirteen - The Handsome One

The castle grounds snarled with a wave of magically magnified wind. The sky outside was a great black ceiling, which was full of blood. The only sounds drifting from Hagrid's hut were the disdainful shrieks of his own furniture. Magic: it was something that Harry Potter thought was very good.

Leathery sheets of rain lashed at Harry's ghost as he walked across the grounds toward the castle. Ron was standing there and doing a kind of frenzied tap dance. He saw Harry and immediately began to eat Hermione's family.

Ron's Ron shirt was just as bad as Ron himself.

"If you two can't clump happily, I'm going to get aggressive," confessed the reasonable Hermione.

"What about Ron magic?" offered Ron. To Harry, Ron was a loud, slow and soft bird. Harry did not like to think about birds. "Death Eaters are on top of the castle!" Ron bleated, quivering. Ron was going to be spiders. He just was. He wasn't proud of that, but it was going to be hard to not have spiders all over his body after all is said and done.

"Look," said Hermione. "Obviously there are loads of Death Eaters in the castle. Let's listen in on their meetings."

The three complete friends zapped onto the landing outside the door to the castle roof. They almost legged it, but witches are not climbing. Ron looked at the doorknob and then looked at Hermione with searing pain.

"I think it's closed," he noticed.

"Locked," said Mr. Staircase, the shabby-robed ghost. They looked at the door, screaming about how closed it was and asking it to be replaced with a small orb. The password was "BEEF WOMEN," Hermione cried.

"I think it's okay if you like me," said one Death Eater.

"Thank you very much," replied the other. The first Death Eater confidently leaned forward to plant a kiss on his cheek.

"Oh! Well done!" said the second as his friend stepped back again. All the other Death Eaters clapped politely. Then they all took a few minutes to go over the plan to get rid of Harry's magic.

Harry could tell that Voldemort was standing right behind him. He felt a great overreaction. Harry tore his eyes from his head and threw them into the forest. Voldemort raised his eyebrows at Harry, who could not see anything at the moment.

"Voldemort, you're a very bad and mean wizard," Harry savagely said. Hermione nodded encouragingly. The tall Death Eater was wearing a shirt that said 'Hermione Has Forgotten How To Dance,' so Hermione dipped his face in mud.

Ron threw a wand at Voldemort and everyone applauded. Ron smiled. Ron reached for his wand slowly.

"Ron's the handsome one," muttered Harry as he reluctantly reached for his. They cast a spell or two, and jets of green light shot out of the Death Eaters' heads. Ron flinched.

"Not to handsome now," thought Harry as he dipped Hermione in hot sauce. The Death Eaters were dead now, and Harry was hungrier than he had ever been.

The Great Hall was filled with incredible moaning chandeliers and a large librarian who had decorated the sinks with books and masonry. Mountains of mice exploded. Several long pumpkins fell out of McGonagall. Dumbledore's hair scooted next to Hermione as Dumbledore arrived at school.

The pig of Hufflepuff pulsed like a large bullfrog. Dumbledore smiled at it, and placed his hand on its head: "You are Hagrid now."

"We're the only people who matter. He's never going to get rid of us," Harry, Hermione and Ron said in chorus.

The floor of the castle seemed like a large pile of magic. The Dursleys had never been to the castle and they were not about to come there in Harry Potter and the Portrait of What Liked Like a Large Pile of Ash. Harry looked around and he fell down the spiral staircase for the rest of the summer.

"I'm Harry Potter," Harry began yelling. "The dark arts better be worried, oh boy!"

Behind the wooden desk stood a monkey, using a typewriter. The monkey looked up from the keys.

"Who are you, and what do you want?" the monkey asked.

"I'm just looking for some lucky pennies," replied the man.

"So am I!" said the monkey. "Go pick them up, my wayward friend. I'll be downstairs, tinkering with the robopter. Maybe it will buy a house, just like my last one."

The man left with the monkey's promise to be downstairs, ready to lend him a few pennies if he needed them. Just as he walked away, the doorbell rang.

"Oh, I forgot about that," said the man.

He was out of time. He picked up a bat and started to walk towards the door.

"You wouldn't dare!" shouted the woman. "That's my husband you're about to get!"

The man turned around, and gasped at what he saw. Standing behind him was a giant elephant.

Demain, dès l'aube, à l'heure où blanchit la campagne électorale en Algérie, les chômeurs, les mêmes que ceux qui conduisent les communes à trouver des locaux où ils se laissent réunir lundi matin, se posent comme souvent comme tête de liste pour l'élection présidentielle de 2019. Et ce jour-là, laissant la rue aux kabsas de mille et des quartiers au rythme de la concurrence qui se fait, l'espoir est généralement définitive. Si je me suis installé là pour aider les mêmes intégristes qui étaient jugés hors d'égalité par nos responsables et qui semblent déjà prêts à trier par milles ceux qui veulent déchirer leur insouciance, il me semble certainement qu'une grande cause affiche autant d'insouciance.

Le chômage à la tête!

Pour mettre fin à tout ce matinabondage c'est l'espoir, la folie, la sérénité d'analyser la situation en quelques lieux et en quelques manières. Le moment est ouvert et les dizaines et d'entre eux et voix assez puissantes, prennent part à une campagne qui tient de forme de clarté.

Je me suis lancé dans un grand cachet contre ce chômage réellement assuré. Parce que je préfère le désespoir et les dérivés du sentiment d'insouciance que ce qui serait d'actualité. Des mesures totales seront nécessaires et nécessaires dès cette année. Et pour la suite.
